Final Research Paper Reflection

The semester has come to an end and my final research paper, in my opinion, is a writing piece that I'm more proud of compared to the first writing I have done. As I progressed this semester my writing has improved significantly and I think this research paper shows how well I've gotten. Compared to the first paper my organization and structural conventions have improved, for example, my body paragraphs don't steer away from the main topic being discussed and formatting has improved as I can now format my paper in correct APA format. The process assignment that led up to the final research paper has helped me throughout the writing process because I took those assignments and incorporated them into my research paper which from there made writing the actual paper easier.

Overall, the research paper was a chance to not only show my knowledge on the topic I choose but displayed my improved writing ability. Also as show an understanding of the book we read, Weapons Of Math Destruction as one of the topics is from the book. For a final paper, I'm happy as to what I got grade wise but in terms of writing not really because I was trying to make sure I had 10 pages so I think I repeated myself a couple of times. If I had the chance to rewrite it, I would because I think I could do better if I had more time and didn't have a page count then possibly the writing could improve. Would I change the topic? No, this paper made me open my eyes and see something that I really wouldn't have paid attention to. My favorite aspect of this paper as we had the freedom of choosing a topic instead of being assigned one which made the paper somewhat easy and not as overwhelming or forceful to write. But I'm glad to have this paper on my portfolio as it's something I can say I wrote but in a good way.
